Under Washington's leadership, the United States established its first federal government. The new government included a president, a

Congress, and a Supreme Court. The federal government was responsible for conducting foreign affairs, raising revenue, and regulating commerce.

Washington's support for a strong federal government was not universally popular. Many people, especially in the South, feared that a strong central government would infringe on their individual liberties. However, Washington's vision for a strong federal government ultimately prevailed.

The Bill of Rights

The Bill of Rights is the first ten amendments to the United States Constitution. The Bill of Rights protects individual liberties, such as the right to freedom of speech, the right to bear arms, and the right to a fair trial.

Washington was a strong supporter of the Bill of Rights. He believed that the Bill of Rights was necessary to protect individual liberties from the encroachment of the federal government.

The Bill of Rights was adopted in 1791. The Bill of Rights is one of the most important documents in American history. It has helped to protect individual liberties for over 200 years.

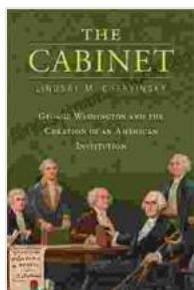

The Two-Party System

The two-party system is a political system in which two major political parties dominate the political landscape. In the United States, the two major political parties are the Democratic Party and the Republican Party.

Washington was one of the founders of the two-party system. He believed that a two-party system would help to ensure that the government was responsive to the will of the people.

The two-party system has been a major feature of American politics for over 200 years. The two-party system has helped to ensure that the government is responsive to the will of the people.

George Washington was a visionary leader who played a vital role in the creation of many American institutions. The federal government, the Bill of Rights, and the two-party system are all part of Washington's legacy. These institutions have helped to shape the United States into the nation it is today.
