Resurrection is a novel by Leo Tolstoy, first published in 1899. The novel follows the story of Prince Dmitri Ivanovich Nekhlyudov, a wealthy landowner who, after serving on a jury that sentences a young woman to death, becomes haunted by guilt and sets out on a journey of redemption. Resurrection is a powerful and moving story that explores themes of justice, morality, and redemption.

Plot Summary

The novel opens with Nekhlyudov serving on a jury in a murder trial. The defendant, a young woman named Katusha Maslova, is accused of poisoning her lover. Nekhlyudov is initially convinced of Katusha's guilt, but as the trial progresses, he begins to have doubts. He eventually votes to acquit her, but the other jurors overrule him and Katusha is sentenced to death.

After the trial, Nekhlyudov is haunted by guilt. He visits Katusha in prison and learns that she is pregnant with his child. Nekhlyudov resolves to do everything in his power to save Katusha and her unborn child. He petitions the governor for clemency, but his request is denied. Nekhlyudov then decides to follow Katusha to Siberia, where she is being sent to serve her sentence.

Along the way, Nekhlyudov meets a variety of people who help him to understand the true nature of justice and redemption. He learns that the justice system is often unjust, and that the only true redemption comes from within.
